

COPENHAGEN SCHOOL OF
GLOBAL HEALTH

UNIVERSITY OF COPENHAGEN

Intensive course:

Health in Emergencies and Refugee Health

Recent disaster and conflict related crises have demonstrated the overwhelming need for skilled professionals who are able to respond adequately to complex emergencies.

The University of Copenhagen offers an intensive four-week course on Health in Emergencies and Refugee Health aimed at professionals working, or aiming to work, with national or international emergency management agencies, relief organizations, national governments or the UN system.

In order to develop a solid base for action, the course offers a combination of state-of-the-art theoretical knowledge, familiarisation with the newest guidelines and agreed approaches, as well as practical exercises through group work.

The course aims at providing participants with an in-depth understanding of the complex range of issues involved in planning, implementing and accounting for health interventions in contemporary emergencies. This includes an understanding of the rapidly evolving humanitarian reform process, and the roles which may be taken by local, national and international partners.

The course is also a part of the Master of International Health, as well as the Master of Disaster Management, which is offered in close collaboration with Lund University.
